Usually when I write an essay on a topic of the day, I will title it something like “Today I Learned” or “Everything I Know About Tumblr (and Here’s What You Need To Know)”. But I also appreciate a good collection of images with the text. A few months ago I decided to make a scrapbook of my favorite photos from the past year. I put everything in my book along with a brief description and then I’d randomly pick out a picture and write a little blurb about the thing that happened. For example: “This photo of a friend and I standing in a field of grass reminds me of that really great day when I ran into her randomly at this park and we decided to hang out. We had so much fun!” I had the idea to make a page dedicated to a specific theme, but I could only think of a few: Stories I’ve been learning Things I’m loving right now I decided that I would have to do it in small increments, a few at a time, so I could maintain some focus on the book. I liked the idea of making a page for each month of the year, and every time I thought of an idea for a month, I would record my thoughts in the book about that theme. I wasn’t really happy with the way that I had been writing, but I also didn’t want to come back in February and say that I didn’t make the best effort. I’m here to tell you that it was worth it. The prompts I came up with have been really helpful for me. I have lots of little surprises about the months and years I’ve written. 3e33713323
