Assassins Creed Syndicate Gold Edition MULTi16-ElAmigos.NASA has launched its first supercomputer in two decades, a dragon's lair for the hardware that will power the next five decades of research into everything from climate change to space travel.

The supercomputer will run the agency's next generation scientific projects and challenge everything from cancer research to a new day-night vision system for the US Navy. NASA officials were tight-lipped about the $100 million machine's capabilities, or even its ultimate purpose, other than to generate simulated data for projects like the International Space Station. They offered little insight into why the White House had decided that the Department of Energy and NASA should share equally the funding and responsibility of the machine. "It is a formidable and huge system," NASA's associate administrator for research, Thomas Zurbuchen, told reporters on Monday at the agency's headquarters in Washington. "It's the largest new supercomputer system ever built. It's going to be the number one on any lists that are published in 10 years, but I wouldn't expect to put it on that one for a while." The system, named Deep Blue, is the result of a partnership between NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory (JPL) and the California Institute of Technology (Caltech). JPL, a division of the California Institute of Technology in Pasadena, built the computer, while Caltech managed the spaceflight aspects. The machine is fueled by 32,256 chips, each as powerful as 18 desktop computers. It has 150 petabytes of data storage, and an estimated 240 terabytes of raw data per

rejoin the Portland Trail Blazers next season, according to ESPN's Adrian Wojnarowski. Robinson was drafted 21st overall by the Detroit Pistons in 2012. Per Woj, the Blazers have agreed to re-sign both Robinson and Evan Turner and have interest in Phoenix Suns forward Aaron Bay
